

0.0.1 Intention (2)

0. At Savatthi.

1. “That which, O bhikkhus, one intends, and that which one thinks over, and that which one has a tendency towards, that is the foothold for the persistence of consciousness. There being a foothold, there is the establishment of consciousness. In one whose consciousness is established and has come to growth, there is an actualization of a being again in the future. There being an actualization of a being again in the future, there is future birth, old age and death, sorrow, lamentation, physical suffering, mental suffering and despair. Thus arises this entire amassment of suffering.

2. If, O bhikkhus, one does not intend, if one does not think over, yet one has a tendency towards [something], that is the foothold for the persistence of consciousness. There being a foothold, there is the establishment of consciousness. In one whose consciousness is established and has come to growth, there is an actualization of a being again in the future. There being an actualization of a being again in the future, there is future birth, old age and death, sorrow, lamentation, physical suffering, mental suffering and despair. Thus arises this entire amassment of suffering.

3. But from the time, O bhikkhus, one does not intend, and one does not think over, and one has no tendency towards [anything], there is not the foothold for the persistence of consciousness. There being no foothold, there is no establishment of consciousness. With consciousness unestablished and not having come to growth, there is no actualization of a being again in the future. There being no actualization of a being again in the future, there is no future birth, old age and death, sorrow, lamentation, physical suffering, mental suffering and despair. Thus ceases this entire stock of suffering.”